Well said ACK. Tho i believe a reason these mod 'teams' are failing is because the majority are nothing more than groups of young teens (10 - 16 yr olds) who have become internet acquaintances that obviously don't know each other in real life, and therefore have no real personal interaction/dedication to each other. Leaving their mods to die, because either they don't speak to each other regularly, or they just get bored of people they don't personally know. It's obvious that nobody from these mod teams over the internet can be made to do anything against their will, so you can understand that if any of the team members lose the motivation to mod, the whole team is screwed.
