There are two common standardized tests in the US: SAT and ACT. (I don't remember offhand what those two things stand for though.)

The SAT has two sections, verbal and math, and each one is scored out of a possible 800 points. So a perfect score would be a 1600, but when asking for your score, people (and by that I mean colleges and things like that) often want to know what you got on each of the two sections.

I got a 1590 (790 verbal, 800 math) and my sister got a 1580 (780 verbal), so I really don't think a 1300 is very impressive. The test is pretty pitifully easy, too -- I'm kinda ashamed to admit I actually got a question wrong on it. :oops: (But people often take it multiple times and only report their best score, and I only took it once, so I don't feel toooooo bad....)

The ACT is a similar test, but it's scored differently. A perfect score is a 36. (My sis got a 35, and I got a 34.)

(Also, it's funny you mention that clause stuff, because I only just noticed the PM you sent me about it today!)
