heh, I'm not taking sides here but something I saw on a program recently.

A few days ago there was a documentary on stupidity, yes stupidity. They referred to reasons of who would qualify as the lowest common denominator, and how we as a whole tend to respect and look up to stupidity rather than intelligence. One person that was featured as a possible lowest common denominator was Bush. They quoted such things as the speech where he states "It's a struggle between good, and a struggle between evil" (good vs good and evil vs evil?). However, they did mention as they had with others, that maybe it's an act. Seeing as how people look up more to stupidity than intelligence, maybe like so many others, he's acting stupid to gain and keep public approval.

If need be, I can discuss this documentary more, so as to get the point across as to why we prefer stupidity over intelligence, but my point has been stated, so unless asked, I won't go any further.
