Wow...that was highly entertaining stuff...I LOL'd several times

I have no problem with protesters...specifically peaceful protesters. I don't feel sorry at all for the assholes who get arrested for throwing rocks and purposefully block traffic. This IS America and everyone has a right to state their opinion, but hurting and impeding others while you are doing it is not right.

"But", it seems apparent that there is a large number of "professional protesters" out there, with a closet full of posterboard and magic markers, ready to join any throng of people they see gathering. "Yeah! It's protest time baby! Lets go hang out with some people and maybe even get on TV...if I'm lucky I might even get laid!". Mindless lemmings.

There are some actual intelligent protesters, such as the fellow at the end of the second video. Why can't more of them be like him, instead of the drunken & high people carrying signs saying "Fuck Bush he is Hitler" jumping up and down on peoples cars?

My point being that statistics show that anytime a group of people start to form, many will join it and "pretend" to be on their side, when really they just don't have anything more exciting to do that day. When placed on the spot and asked real questions about the issues they supposedly feel so strongly about, they fumble for an answer and the hilarity depicted in these videos ensues.
