Subject: How Bush will steal the 2004 Election...

These voting machines could be "tweaked" either way. Maybe two hackers will get into a hacking war and each candidate will get 479 bazillion votes. You just assume that it will be tweaked in a way that doesn't help you.

Of course that's based on the assumption that any tampering will occur.

As for the war justification, I couldn't care less about international law blah blah blah... The United States Congress voted in a large majority to disarm Saddam Hussein. I don't believe the liberation of the people was a main goal, but merely a very nice side effect. I see firsthand the improvements in Iraq through the appearance of a Cisco Networking Academy in the country. This tells me that the citizens of Iraq are now going to be able to learn higher technology. Couple that with the oil in Iraq and that country is well-equipped to stand on its own feet. It will take a couple years, yes... but they are on the right path. Iraq was a largely unstable area and it's been proven time and time again that Saddam fostered and nurtured terrorists. It's a great place to start turning that region into a more productive and safe place for their citizens and the world.

Since the start of military action in Iraq, we have others who DO definitely have nukes who are now willing to play ball and have diplomatic relations with the United States (and the UN I'm sure) because they see that the US takes care of its own. You can shove the politics and the red tape of international law and the UN right up your asses because I don't want myself or anyone I care about become the victim of another terrorist attack.

The troops who are there right now were not forced to serve. Every single one of them knows that they may die in service. I don't want to see a single person die, but the worst thing we can do to those brave men and women is to dishonor them by saying that they died for nothing. The strength of the military's numbers lies in how we treat them when they come back. To read your own countrymen saying that your friends who died in the sand died for no good reason would infuriate me.
