(Philosophy)

1. Identifying and discussing Monism and Dualism, and what they are thought of by today's philosophers.

(Law)

2. Identify the two major types of Law, and their subcategories.

1. In reverse order, since I feel it's easier to explain that way; Dualism is the belief that there are two parts to reality; or rather, that what we see and experience is not everything that exists. The spiritual vs the physical, and all that shit. Monism isn't. It's like what we see is what it is. (Dualism == DesCartes, Monism == Kant).

However, I don't know how "today's" philosophers feel about it, since I think after Socrates and Aristotle, we're just mentally masturbating. We should just read their shit and be like "yeah, that's how it is."

2. My guess: Criminal and Civil or it could be Private and public (similar, but different) or Military and Civilian, though that's similar to answer #2 but not so much with answer #1.

After all, military justice isn't subject to the laws of this country.

And subdivisions; umm ... shit. It's been forever since I read about this stuff. I give up?
