

---

Subject: Lets put a positive spin on some facts for once

Posted by Hydra on Tue, 14 Sep 2004 19:21:57 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

JavaxcxWhoa, hold up there. Where were you during the Battle of Britian (and no, sending a few supplies over there doesn't really help the manpower issue)? What about every major conflict prior to Normandy? Listen to Warranto man, I highly suggest it. It is a fair assumption that the United States would have sat over there here in the west and did nothing until it was too late should Pearl Harbour have never happened.

Firstly, it was hardly just a "few" supplies we sent to aid Britian in the war. Secondly, Would you not call Operation Torch major? Thirdly, it was inevitable that the U.S. would have gotten involved in the war, whether Pearl Harbor was bombed or not. The American people saw the Nazi war machine eat up Europe and knew it wouldn't be contained just there after all of Europe fell to its power, so most of the isolationists pulled their heads out of their asses and started gearing up for war. Then, Pearl Harbor was bombed, which only expedited our entry into the war.

---