
Subject: Your religion?

Posted by Scythar on Thu, 30 Sep 2004 19:07:02 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

<print current_thoughts_raw>

Nice reply Nukelt. It's interesting to think it like this:

A higher power is often thought to be "everywhere". Many gods in different religions have a power that's in the nature itself, and even the Christian God is described as omnipresent (As far as I know). Now, if the god is everywhere and everything, does it really matter what you believe into? Don't you believe into the "true" deity, or at least to a part of it, by believeng into ANYTHING? God isn't often described very well for obvious reasons, so it's an interesting question.

Of course this kind of thought is a bit childish and illogical (what are heathen gods then? Or "the bad god" (Like Satan) which is in many religions?), but it's a thought nevertheless.

I guess you could also think that the god could be somekind of balanced force, both good and evil. This way you could believe either in it's good side or the bad side, but when you start to think more of that, it'll get very complicated. At least for me.

"(Un)holy Deity!" Went kind of off-topic there... Ö_ö
