

---

Subject: Bush: Pre-Senile Dementia?

Posted by Nukelt15 on Tue, 12 Oct 2004 01:51:05 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

I think it could be a vest as well. It would make perfect sense to not tell anyone he was wearing one- or even to deny he was wearing one. If there was a shooter somewhere in the audience, if they knew he had a vest on, they might shoot for the head instead- and a helmet would have been much harder to conceal (that, and someone would be bound to say there was a headset concealed in it, yadda yadda yadda). Somewhat like the flight suit that people have been complaining about from that carrier landing- well, he couldn't very well sit in an ejection seat (and you'd better believe that's where he was) with a suit and tie on.

You're making mountains out of molehills here. Even if it was a receiver, so what? It obviously doesn't help him in anyway, so why the big problem with it? If it were Kerry with a "mysterious" shape under his jacket, the Democrats wouldn't care at all; it would be the Republicans bitching about it. I fail to see the significance of this; I'd place good money that candidates have been fed debate answers since they started doing debates in the first place.

Whee, political sniping... :rolleyes:

---