

---

Subject: Bush: Pre-Senile Dementia?

Posted by Nukelt15 on Tue, 12 Oct 2004 14:45:59 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Quote:Hydra, do you really believe that because Bush can't spell words correctly, that he's too tired? I've yet to see another President lose his abilities of eloquency for a debate.

Ever hear of a little disorder called dyslexia? People with dyslexia typically mix up letters and numbers, both in writing and speech- I should know, I have a bit of it myself. Now, this might not show while the president is reading a speech written by someone else, or while he is typing something that can easily be edited before it is posted, he would not have that same convenience at a debate, where all his words are his own and there is no on-the-spot editing. I would bet any amount of money that's what is going on- it has nothing whatsoever to do with intelligence or how nervous he is. Please, feel free to ask a doctor if you don't believe me.

Stop picking on speech impediments and talk about real issues that actually have some relevance. Like, say, the quality of the candidate's character, or his stance on different controversial issues, or record in office, or something like that. What difference does it make if the man can't dot his i's and cross his t's; it's the message that matters, not how you look while giving it- don't be so damn superficial in your criticism.

---