Look up the 2004 national SAT score stats at collegeboard.com. Sort the states by percent participation (that is, the number of people who took the SAT's over the total number of people who were in the correct age groups but did not take the SATs). Now, next to each state, write down "Bush" or "Kerry" according to who won each state. Tada!

Conclusion: states whose students are less involved with higher education and elements of higher education tended to vote for Bush.

But who knows, maybe Tennessee is actually really smart, but it's just a bad test taker, so it decided not to take it.
