The "rightness" of the (any)action is nonconsequentialist as far as I'm concerned.

This means, essentially, that the rightness of the action depends on more than the ends which come about. Sure, breaking the law to some is "wrong", but in the longer run the rightness of the action (at least theoretically at this point) outweighs the "wrongness" of breaking the law.

But you are right, it DOESN'T make it legal.
