Considering he hasn't been deemed a terrorist, what do you think?

Since neither of us know for certain, but he didn't admit to one (as far as we know, because he was, and is still considered merely a suspect), the probability lies closer to the "I'm not a terrorist" bit.

But then again, would you admit to being a terrorist, even while being tortured? Not only that, we don't know when this situation actually took place in correlation to with the other tortures. Admitting to being a terrorist PROBABLY wouldn't have changed anything about his situation, and in all likelihood would have amplified it.

So I'd bet he said that he wasn't a terrorist. Unless of course you can prove otherwise.
