With coma's, and its not like on tv where you just lie there for years on end with your eyes closed, if you don't wake up within 30 days the chances of your ever recovering are minimal, at best.

She has been there 15 or so years, no improvement. Only her brainstem functions. Even of she was kept alive, she would never get better.

As for living wills. That's what the court have been arguing about all this time, and it hasn't been just one judge. She had no living will, so it had to be established what her intentions would have been. Over and over they have agreed that she would not want to live this way, if you can call it living. Without enough grey matter you cant even call it existing.
