True but the kids are the ones doing the eating.. when they come to a certain age they will be eating not just what they have at their house, but what they want to eat outside. parents can't always control that, even at a young age (hell I've seen really young kids out in groups at KFC) weren't you already doing your own thing at like 7? as a parent i'm sure you don't "always" want to deny your children what they want, and that's a way to get addictions. I agree though that a lot of parents aren't cut out for it and do a really bad job.....I see the results of this at my work nearly every time I am there.

what I am trying to say is kids'll be encouraged to eat less if they see cookie monster eating less plus when kids are young these things will have more influence on them than when they get older.

that's all the programme is trying to achieve.. if they aren't a fan of the programme, or don't really care, then it won't affect anything. plus there is still all the other stuff in sesame street to enjoy..
