You can show the public something, but you shouldn't show them everything, and you shouldn't show them something every other day. No corporation follows this trait; when they decide to have a press release, it usually includes minimal details and showcases. No studio in their right mind would tell everybody everything they are doing and show them everything they are making. By the time the game is done, they will know every inch of it. What would be the point in buying the thing if you already knew all the surprises?

Know that I wasn't directing my opinion on any one party, but everyone in general. It's fine if you don't care, but do know that others are turned away from it, and it will only hurt in the long run.

Renardin: Take your own advise. Shut up and mod.
