it's not the "curing of deseases" that they're worried about, it's the "babies" that everyone sees at the bottom of the slippery slope. The only way to know if they can clone a human is to give it a whirl, if they fuck it up and it lives anyway, what are the implications? Do we let them keep trying, because they can then "see" what they did wrong? How many mutated children do we want sitting in labs hoping they die soon? Then there are the folks who will want to make sure theirkids grow up singers, so they'll splice the genes to give them a famous voice, or perfect abs, etc. There's just too much shit that they could do with the technology that makes people flinch. I don't think anyone would complain if they cured cancer with it.
