It wouldn't be a problem if stupid parents wouldn't buy M-rated games for their 10 year olds in the first place. Most game stores won't let anyone under the recommended age of 17 buy them anyway (and let's face it...there's nothing in an AO rated game that a 17 year old is going to be unfamiliar with).

This is yet another case of "let's blame the industry for our own bad parenting." Seriously...nude and sex mods have been around as long as games with characters.

The point is that there is no way to access the "Hot Coffee" content using what came in the package with the game. You HAVE to download a third-party mod to unlock it. It does not matter if the content was there in the first place or not; unless you mod the game it is as good as not there at all.

Besides, all the mod does is reveal a minigame where characters dry-hump each other. You have to download a set of third-party nude skins to take their clothes off.
