Responsible parents are supposed to let their children buy anything and then take away the innapropriate stuff after they've used them? That doesn't sound like responsible to me, responsible parents would have been at the store with their children in the first place to decide what their children can or can't get. The law only makes it so the child can't get it himself without the parent's knowledge (or some adult), it doesn't take responsibility away from the parent.

Besides setting a precedent for lawsuits and/or whatever, it has no real effect since most retail and game stores already don't sell M rated games to those under 17.
