There in itself lies a paradox.....

If you killed him, yes you would save millions of lives in the long run. But how many existences would you destroy?

for example, without world war II I wouldn't exist today, my nana was Austrian, my grandfather was English, they met when the allies won and occupied Austria, he could speak 8 languages and was digging a trench when they first met, she thought he was a prisoner of war....but she emigrated to England.

So my dad and my auntie are out of the picture. My aunties 2 children, my brother and I, my baby girl....Now take just that selection of people that no longer exist and multiply it by how many generations they could create....that's what messing with time does.

I would use a time machine to go back into the Prehistoric parts of the world, and see what color dinosaurs really were...because no one knows!

You realize you basically just repeated what I had already said, right, Clare?
