You guys are probably thinking of the Norton that has all of the useless shit such as anti-spyware and firewalls. I have the corporate edition, which is anti-virus and NOTHING else. I never have to do long annoying scans because it catches viruses RIGHT when you get them. It has yet to fail me, and I've been using it for over two years now.

Two years? That means that if you use it legally, it has cost you 100 € now. The corporate edition is as bad as the others: it doesn't catch all viruses, catches no spyware at all and uses a lot of resources. NOD32 costs 39 $ for a year, so that would make about 70 € for 2 years and does protect against viruses and other threats and does so while using way less resources.

Then again, the marketing budget of Norton Antivirus is waaaaaaaaay bigger than that from NOD32, hence most people have Norton (just like Windows which was also pushed in the market).
