She has spinal / brain cancer.

Gunny -- If you happen to make it to this thread, I have words of encouragement for you. A man I know well was diagnosed with a very aggressive cancerous tumor in his occipital lobe. He had been experiencing severe headaches, and occasionally his vision would get dark and foggy. The doctors expected him to become blind within just a few weeks, and only gave him several months to live. That was almost 2 years ago now, he is now in remission, and has the same vision he had before it all started.

For a while there, it didn't look like he had much of a chance of survival, he was extremely sick from the chemo, and the effects of the tumor were terrible, he had slurred speech, and poor mobility due to the pressure of the tumor on the rest of his brain. They did a very risky operation to remove as much of the tumor as they could, and within a few weeks, he suddenly returned to normal, no traces of cancerous material in his brain anymore.

Miracles do happen, so pray every day, and never EVER give up. Fight the cancer right to the bitter end of it!
