
Subject: Re: -]EL[- Looking for members.

Posted by Sniper_De7 on Wed, 14 Dec 2005 17:11:49 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Large games and smaller games are completely different though. I think he was mostly pointing out that the lacking of teamwork in a 1v1-3v3 is the "team" part since there's only 1 or 2 other people (well, at least that's what i got out of his statement). People who are play larger games most or all the time are (under normal circumstances) better at those larger games than people who play smaller ones most or all the time and vice versa.. Of course you need some skill to win the games. In my opinion it's best for any single person to try to play a mix of the games. You can learn more that way. Although playing a huge game probably wouldn't be so much since whatever you do it won't have as much effect because there's more people to hinder you. (8v8 is usually a good number)

I do agree that it takes a lot of effort to get more people to do what you want in order to win. That's probably where a lot of people fail at. You know.. Like rushing out and they're all aiming at different tanks or something on Field. For me it just isn't so much fun when playing a smaller game to a bigger one. It just gets boring.
