I'm only really starting to get into the computer building phase.

RAID allows you to link two hard drives together. If I remember correctly, this is how it goes:

RAID 0:
Two hard drives are linked together. The total space is the combined space of both of the drives.

RAID 1:
The contents of one drive are copied onto the second drive for further backup of data.

It's something like that at least. Just search Google for a better answer.
