Heh...

It doesn't say he died, it doesn't say that it was her revolver, or that she used it, it doesn't say that she was confessing to anything, etc.

She could have been a gun enthusiast who was practicing her aim at a target range, she was telling a story about her old friend who was learning the violin, she emptied her revolver down range, checked the target and handed the gun to the officer who was supervising the range.

She could have been a detective investigating a case about a suspect killing his/her friend who was learning the violin. She handed the policeman the empty revolver she found in the suspect's apartment, telling them what she thinks so far about the motive for why the suspect killed him.

There are an infinite of possibilities.
