

---

Subject: Re: "Protecting" kids who are unable to tell fantasy from reality

Posted by flood3d on Tue, 10 Oct 2006 17:05:53 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

U927 wrote on Sat, 07 October 2006 11:30 What was the original topic again?

There is no way to protect kids from acting out their fantasies. The fact that some people are trying to prevent that not only shows a complete lack of common sense, but also a complete lack of responsibility. The only reason they want to "protect" them from books, violent video games, and TV is so they don't have to worry about not giving them proper supervision themselves.

The problem doesn't lie in what is being published; it lies in the parents themselves. If you don't want your kid to read Harry Potter, fine. Do it in your own household, don't try to enforce your beliefs on everybody else.

Amen, to that!

---