After having my 2 left wisdom teeth torn out the 4th of October, I've had the 'honour' of getting the right two torn out this morning.

The sound of cracking teeth and the smell/taste of teeth being splattered to pieces while still in your mouth isn't as bad as the dentist continually saying you need to open your mouth wider. It took her, once again, 45 minutes.

So you'll say "why not do it under general anesthesie"? The funny part is I wanted to but my dentist insisted that the right wisdom teeth weren't needed. Only to find out one month later they had huge problems, ofcourse.

2 days off of work is a small bonus, now the hardest comes: the waking up of the local anesthesie. Ice bags FTW!

So far my rant for today.
