Thats proper law. I see no wrong in a situation like that.

Thats why its called (in the UK) Positive discrimination. It only defines that if there is a job that needs filled specifically by male or female, then it grants a right to the employer to fullfill their obligation by selecting male/female respectively.

I too have only given an example. But in the UK this is LAW.

Imagine a family member in a nursing home. Who would you prefer washes and cleans your Mums body in the shower and bath? A man? certainly not for me, thats undignified. Now this is where Positive discrimination takes place.
