Crimson As I said before, your drug use CAN and probably DOES affect other people. Even to the most minor of affects, if you get drunk at Disney World and act like a typical drunk kid, then the sober people around you will have less fun because they have to deal with you acting like a retard. Whether it's because a ride operator has to hold the ride for you to get off or on, or stop you from doing something stupid that endangers your safety, or when you puke on someone's shoe or lap or they see the pile of puke you left on the sidewalk and get sick themselves... you affect the people around you.

it's all true. I live in a city where all of this is quite commonplace in nightlife. now, i don't think there is such a thing as a recreational drug, nor is there such a thing as a responsible drugs user. taking a single unprescribed drug automatically makes you irresponsible of your own body. again, just my opinion.

now, i think most of us don't actually intend to get so bad as to start all the annoying practises, e.g. shout so loudly at mates who are only 5 feet away that people in africa can hear you, start fights, hit on girls who make it clear they aren't interested at all, leave the club and go home and puke all over the place. I know many people go out to get wasted, though, and those are the selfish ones who have total disregard for others' enjoyment. The rest of us just get drinks and enjoy ourselves.

I don't mean to digress, but this is a subject that interests me:

One thing i've noticed is that some of the practises people do when drunk, that you'd probably pass off as forgivable drunken stupors, do in fact reflect that person's personality. People who become really annoying, start banging into people and shouting their heads off, tend to be unrespectable people that you wouldn't want to meet when sober anyway. You'd rarely see a respectable person with that much alcohol in them do most of these things; they'd keep to themselves, or just realise they've had too much and go home to sleep it off.

I suppose this is in defense of z310 saying he wouldn't start annoying everyone if he was drunk or doped up on some drug; believe me i've had my experiences with drunken idiots and i've come to hate city nightlife because of them. Anyhoo, back on topic!..
