They better freakin not implement it here, this is the U.S. of A. and it is our RIGHT to own guns!

K but back on topic about the Canadian law, I really don't think it's gonna be too effective on anything. Sure it might screen prospective troublemakers, but most people buy guns for either hunting or self-defense. Most careful criminals have MANY other ways of getting guns that circumvent the law.

It doesn't really matter where you are, as long as there are criminals who want to make trouble, they will find a way to get a gun, even if the law outlaws them 100%. Therefore, it's my view that if you take away guns from the public, you are taking away the public's right to protect themselves.

Now I know this law is merely making it harder to get guns due to face-to-face interview, but I still don't think that's gonna do much.
