The meaning of life is to continue to live.

The way you can arrive at this is by looking at the most basic parts that all life has in common. Survival.

To allow the species to thrive and prosper is the only real reason life exists in the first place, and why all life is driven toward that purpose. What would be the use of existing if we were to just die out? Therefor, in order to prevent that, we must sustain the species as long as possible. To that effect, the only reason we live is to ensure our survival. Life does not have any real greater purpose, even if you include the worship of a god. If that were the greater purpose, rather than an extra, we would have developed as mindless automatons

The purpose of life has nothing to do with religion. Religion is simply our way of interpreting the will of God. I'm Roman Catholic, and even I can understand that.(Heck, I also believe in evolution and the big bang, and it's not so exclusive of God as people would like you to believe).
