I very rarely hit the Windows key on accident, but it happens, and it worse in some games than others. (Like C&C3... it takes forever to come back)

However, I use the Windows key ALL the time when I'm not gaming and "disabling it in Windows", if I even found where to do that, would be a pain in the ass to do and undo all the time. With the G15, I just throw a little switch to the right and no worries. It's not a major annoyance but it's sure nice to have.

Of course, that's not normally a primary motivation for the G15 keyboard. For me, it's all about the backlighting, the 18 Macro keys that I can record 3 different sets of Macros for, the built in two USB ports, and of course, the super-informative LCD screen where I can keep track of any metric I choose.

But even with all that, if someone bought me an Optimus, I wouldn't turn it down.