
Subject: Re: tony blair steps down

Posted by puddle_splasher on Sun, 20 May 2007 07:36:51 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

f100d3d wrote on Sun, 20 May 2007 01:44Plus if you slam on you breaks because of a speed camera, it wasn't the cameras fault - it was your fault for speeding in the first place.

Speed cameras have been erected in the UK as a means to generate money for the Local Authority and not for the Police (They only enforce the penalty).

Generally speaking the cameras were supposed to be erected in places where there were at least one fatality or 2 serious pedestrian accidents. We all know that this is not the case. The cameras are mounted everywhere and even if people are travelling at the correct speed, particularly on a dual carriageway, there is a tendency to slap on the brakes from 70 mph to 60 mph or less, thus the driver behind brakes and so on down the queue until BANG! CRASH! there is an accident.

Speed cameras are in fact proven beyond reasonable doubt to be causing crashes and some Local Authorities were forced to remove them and to have the total amount of cameras capped at a specific level until further notice.

All this in the name of Blair. Keep in mind that he is but a puppet. He can stand and talk, sure he can but so does a ventriloquists dummy who also has the strings pulled for it.
