Crimson wrote on Wed, 27 June 2007 05:35 Well, I was rather nervous. I haven't gone with anesthetic before (well, I had eye surgery when I was 13 months old to correct a lazy eye but I don't remember it)... also my grandma is 69 years old and diabetic, but she's the matriarch of our family and I think she keeps us all together. I'm named after her (which makes it weird to ask for her room at the hospital since we have the same first and last name) but I can only aspire to be like her. My aunt takes insanely good care of her -- I doubt there are too many 69 year old diabetics who can still walk unassisted and haven't lost any limbs due to poor circulation.

So, I don't think it was a lot of fuss about nothing, even though I'm sure you guys weren't entirely serious.

Also, Vicodin for teh win. I have four huge holes in my mouth and no pain.

Diabetes suck

I know all about it, since I got it too (type 1 though). You can live with it pretty well, but it is annoying, and type 2 is, from what I heard, worse as in the overweight that mostly goes with it also has a bad influence on the limbs etc.

About the dentist:

Teeth removal is the suckage, I had to get 4 teeth removed, and that hurts, afterwards in particular Also, the 4 holes left are weird and annoying
