I currently own a Dell Inspiron 9200. I've been very happy with it, with one notable issue- the monitor started going screwy last winter, and I had to replace it at cost because I couldn't part with it long enough to send it to the shop. Though this comp has served and continues to serve me well, but when it dies I intend to replace it with a MacBook. With Vista becoming standard on everything now (with only a handful of even Dell computers offered without, none of them systems I'd buy), I can't see myself ever buying a prebuilt PC again- laptop or desktop. Both my roommate and his girlfriend replaced their computers with MacBooks this past school year, and from what I've seen they're very capable and nearly indestructible. Since they now run Intel chipsets, you can dual boot Windows if you so choose- which is exactly what I'll do with my copy of XP when the time comes.

My recommendation is to get the MacBook. It is more expensive, yes, but it is the more well built and more capable machine and will very likely last you quite a bit longer.
