Depends to the extent and type involved. If a topic is the victim of an attempt of hijacking, it can recover itself. In that case, there is no point in locking it. The same goes if people don't have an issue with it (lots of topics lead from the original discussion to a related one without the need to forcibly stop it - this topic being one of those. Technically it has been hijacked by us going off on this unrelated tangent. However because of what is being discussed, there is no real reason to lock it as of now).

As for flaming, its unclear, I will admit that. Sometimes the flaming is done in fun, or is a byproduct of something that even the administration thinks is bad.

When in doubt, though, report it. If it is something that should be dealt with, then it will be dealt with, or at least monitored for a while to see if it continues.
