

---

Subject: Re: What happened to sweet little kids?

Posted by Muad Dib15 on Sat, 22 Dec 2007 16:40:58 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

I blame some of the kids that want their lives to be easier, and therefore take it to court.

A little girl who's parents were divorced, was over at her father's house. He told her to get ready for something and she wasn't done in time or something like that. So he spanked her with a wooden kitchen spoon through her jeans. She told her counselor and her dad was charged with child abuse because she didn't do what she was told and was punished.

I also don't think that parents should have their visitation rights revoked on hearsay. Slightly bad example but, in Santa Clause, Scott Calvin's visitation rights were revoked because his kid was telling people that Scott was Santa. The reason the visitation rights were revoked were because Scott was starting to look like Santa, and Neil thought that was bad for Charlie's mental health. What they should have done instead of straight out revoking his right to visit Charlie, the court should have talked to Scott's doctor about his white hair, abnormal facial hair growth speed, and how he gained 45 pounds in a week. That court was just wrong.

It should also be harder to get a divorce without strict evidence. That is also a problem with kids. They think that they don't have to be married. Religion, Starbuzz, might be bad for some things like world peace, but you do have to admit that people that have a religion like Christianity are much less likely to get divorced and still have stable households than nonreligious people.

My problem is, that I know what I mean, but I can't type it. Hopefully you know what I mean with all this.

---