Sure, the studios may support the format, but that can still change. HD-DVD is still backed by the major players in the computer business, and they have the money.

Plus, as noted previously,, the HD-DVD format can use existing DVD replication machines, and therefore, economies of scale will be at play, as well as adaptability.

I have a feeling this fight won't be sorted out for a while. Format wars are won by consumer buying habits and desires. However, with the current economic slowdown in the United States, and consumers not willing to justify paying more for a movie when they find DVD quality good enough, it will take time for either format to gain dominance.

By then, it might be too late for either format, as people will likely just be downloading High-Definition movies by the Internet.
