PS3 MP works with usernames over the PS Network which is free unless a developer charges for game access, like FFXI on PS2. As for the PC handling media features, it's nowhere near as slick as the PS3 and you don't have to load different programs to handle photos, video, music, etc... Plus you're not limited by having to use a wireless keyboard/mouse and fiddle with display settings and/or buy a conversion box to output to TV format.

I guarantee a PS3 makes video playback, photo viewing, and music playback a lot more immersive than a PC does when hooked up to a TV. I can't see myself having 10 people over and trying to use XP as a party machine like I did when we were using the PS3 for music playback on the Earth visualization.

BTW: If you won't buy a console for a feature your PC shares, why get a "wii" when it plays games that look like Renegade's detail level? I have to say that the media server function is a great feature that the Xbox and PS3 share which allows for video/photo/music playback on the consoles over LAN. That alone is worth more than the "wii"
