Yep. For those idiots that don't know how to put anything together but, have loads to spend. I've given this quite a bit of thought as you might be able to tell. IF I could afford it, the service people (in the store) would have like a handheld scanner that allows the service people to show the customers that don't know what is compatible to what, what they could use.

le. Some random guy wants a new gaming computer. The inhouse service guy would show him the best case for it. Then he would enter the type of case in the car-scanner size computer. The computer would tell him what motherboards and power supplies in stock are compatible with the case. The guy chooses the motherboard and power supply of his choice, then the service guy enters that in the computer, and so on.
