Perhaps in England most homicides are unintentional. That's certainly not the case in America. It still happens in America, too, but anything can be used as a weapon in the heat of the moment. A knife, a rock, a lamp, an ax, a wrench, fists, etc... Because of such, even if gun murders went down, you'd see a rise in murders by other methods. You can take the cat out of the jungle, but you can't take the jungle out of the cat.

Removing firearms would only make it so that criminals are the only ones with guns besides law enforcement and military. That's just what an American like myself wants. I want to be completely defenseless against a tyrannical government and a bunch of assholes who think they deserve my stuff more than I do. What a wonderful society I'd be looking at.

I fully support lethal weapons to be used in self-defense. Once you decide that your rights are more important than someone else's that you attack them, you basically forfeit your own. I wouldn't enjoy killing someone, but if it means preventing some asshole from harming me and my family, then so be it.

I don't actually own a gun. Though, I do have every intention of getting one when I come into the money for the gun itself and the license.
