

---

Subject: Re: Obama can't make it...

Posted by nikki6ixx on Wed, 07 May 2008 02:15:54 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Ryan3k wrote on Mon, 05 May 2008 23:38

edit - keep in mind that the democrats are going to expand their house and senate majorities in November. If McCain does win, expect no partisan legislation to be passed for at least 2 years.

Well, I'm not too sure. McCain is well liked by many Democrats, and has had very public support from Joe Lieberman, among others.

McCain is about bringing consensus. People, especially those in Europe, will often accuse him of being another 'Bush' , but McCain is a smart guy: he believes in sound fiscal policy, raised the 'global warming' alarm bell before many even heard of 'global warming' , and he understands that apes were the predecessors of humans.

Even if a Democrat enters the White House, they will be as hawkish as Bush in terms of international conflicts. Make no mistake, just like the Truman, and Eisenhower Doctrine's, the Bush Doctrine, of pre-emptive strikes, unilateral action, and the right to intervene wherever America sees fit will likely govern American foreign policy for at least 50 years.

---