The whole name-changing is utterly horrible. France didn't want to go to war with Iraq for its own reasons, but because their ideas conflicted with ours, America's leaders aimed to erase any good images of the French from our minds. Warm, sunny days in the annual carnival no longer have the word "French" associated with them (you don't go to the food stand for French fries anymore). It's all in an effort to change our opinions, or at least suppress some good ones, about France through the elimination of possible influences. Additional propaganda can furtherly turn our friendly thoughts away from France, and America can then do what they want to the French, with us as its uncomplaining tools. Don't let your own thoughts mean nothing - don't give in to this.
