Quote:In addition to this, I also was enlightened to another question -- what makes a person any religion? I don't consider myself a Christian, yet my friend who does consider himself to be asked me this:

You've read the bible (yes) -- so, would you say you liked what Jesus ("the word" in Islam btw) spoke to the people about? I answered yes. He then called me Christian -- something I would never really consider myself?

What makes a Muslim? A Christian? A Buddhist? etc? You go to a specific place of worship at some given time? Your parents told you that you are? You've read a holy book and now you "belong"?

I wouldn't say simply "liking" the things Jesus said makes you a Christian - Muslims take Jesus as a prophet, but they are not Christians.

If you believe that God came down as Jesus, and got crucified for your sins to be forgiven, then you're a Christian.

If you believe God is the almighty and superior being, and that Muhammed is the last Prophet after the ones in the Old Testament and New Testament, then you're a Muslim.

If you adhere to the teachings of Buddha and detach yourself from material things, then you are a Buddhist.
