yeah, my dad is a respected person in the police department he is not a jerk he does what he is told, he helps people in anyway possible, he takes his job very seriously as he would say. but its your opinion.

I cannot stand police officers. I have absolutely no respect for them at all. They think that just because they have a badge and the government gave them a small amount of authority over everyone else that they have the right to think they are better than everyone else.

A good cop is an officer that will:

-Help someone in need, no questions asked

-If the area is quiet and they are patrolling through it... KEEP it quiet and not blast their siren or something for kicks.

-Treat other citizens with the exact same respect they are looking to receive and none of that "I'm all high and mighty crap."

I can go on and on with listing what a good cop should be, but I have never seen an officer with 2 or more of those traits...

If you ask me, the crime rate is going up against officers, but to be completely honest, they brought it on themselves.

Now I'm not saying ALL police officers are stuck up jerks who enjoy pushing others around, I'm just saying that for those of them that are like that (and there are quite a bit), it is THEIR fault that many people dislike being in the presence of police officers and for that same reason crime against police officers has gone up.

If police officers could just be normal friendly people than I bet there wouldn't be nearly as much violence against them in the first place.
