No... you're not reading. TT will do their best to assure known methods are being rendered useless. If someone with the skill and the time to do so can figure out new methods, they could get around it, but then it could be fixed again. This is just like any other software in the history of time.

Besides, the anti-cheat is only one of the many components of "1.038". If the cheaters don't patch, they don't play with the rest of us, nor do they get all the nifty features.
