I have the feeling that your convictions would fold in a case where birth control failed or a condom broke (the latter has happened to me at least 2ce, luckily nothing happened). In other words - a genuine accident, after all measures to avoid pregnancy were taken. A lot of the people I know who are unapologetically anti-abortion are antisocial, bitter virginal losers who think women who have premarital sex are sluts.

Also, what do you think of morning-after pills? Same as clinical abortion?

Don't be stupid. My opinion wouldn't change. It is my opinion for everything, not just abortion.

People always choose the easy way out, and when laws grant the easy way out, it screws up society because people become lazy, then the lazy way of doing something becomes the standard way of doing something. So what then? People try to laze out of the lazy way and it just keeps going down like that.

There needs to be a law for anything that grants the easy way out of something and says "No, if you can't deal with the consequences, then that is your problem."

It has absolutely nothing to do with me personally. If, in the event that I am involved in a pregnancy scare, would I her to consider abortion? Yes I would. But that shouldn't be an option if the pregnancy doesn't fall under on of those categories.

And I still consider this to be pro-choice.
