I drank human milk... when I was a baby.

This is not practical. One human woman produces enough milk for, at most, two children at a time. Human babies are tiny things; a single woman would be unable to produce enough milk to meet the demands of a human adult- even though the adult does not depend on milk for basic sustenance like the baby does. In order for cow milk to be replaced by human milk, you would need at the very minimum one milk-producing woman for every customer, and she'd probably need to be pumped full of hormones (just like the cows are) to stimulate production. More realistically, you'd need as many women as it takes to break even with a cow's ability to produce milk- sorry, but I haven't got the numbers on that.

Anybody with a brain ought to see that PETA's latest grand scheme just doesn't work.
