Ah, but you see that is exactly what I am talking about with closed-mindedness. Because I stated my opinion and you disagree "I'm wrong". That my friend, is ignorant thinking. I'm not saying evolution is wrong, but I'm not saying its right either. I'm not talking about what I believe in, or what you believe in. I'm talking about the stubbornness of either side to open their minds that the other may be correct.

Quote: As for the idea that we evolved from primates being "just as ridiculous" as creationism, can you really not see the difference between the two? We, as in humans, have 98-99% percent the same DNA as chimpanzees. That, along other obvious similarities between humans and primates, plus the actual observation of evolution as a natural process, is very good evidence to support evolution. On the other hand, there is no evidence in support of the higher power required in creationism anywhere to be found (religious belief is, after all, known as "faith".)

Put it in this perspective: Evolution is a funny word. And as one scientist in the documentary put it: It depends on how one defines the word 'evolution'. Darwins theory didn't talk about how one species changed over time, but rather how one species was the basis of many, or all species we have today. When it comes down to it, the hardcore Darwinists will say themselves that the theory itself lacked what one would actually expect of a theory. There are many holes, nothing was clearly defined.

so then do you have any reason at all to believe in christianity other than the fact you were brainwashed from birth to believe in it

Hah! When I was young I never thought about any of it. Church was just a yawn fest to me. It wasn't until I became older and more intelligent that I started to think about these things and that my great respect for the wonders of the world developed.
