So earlier this year it became law in California that you could not use your cell phone in the car without some sort of hands free device, leading everyone in the state to become "that douchebag that wears their bluetooth all the time, even when they're not on it."

Anyway, I got a BlueAnt Z9i, a GREAT unit if I don't say so myself. It's got a noise cancelling algorithm that makes it so the other person can't even tell you're in the car. It's fantastic.

But ANYWAY... I'm forced by law to wear this thing in the car, and it has a blue LED on it that flashes every few seconds to indicate that it's on and connected to my phone.

Tonight, I got pulled over and given a ticket because apparently it's against federal law to have a flashing blue light in your car. The officer explained that it can be confused with a police siren.

So WTF am I supposed to do???
